

I've been off line for a while. Apparently the question is what I see as the differences in Craft and other religions.

There are many that I count as important but two come most readily to mind.

1. We incorporate the dark side of our nature, recognize it as a part of us and learn to live with it and even use it to understand who and what we are. This in turn allows us to recognize the real nature of others and therefore understand them better, in some cases better than they can understand themselves.

Others, in particular Xians, try to separate these two sides of human nature and are therefore by necessity incomplete, not whole. By denying that side of one's nature one never can be truly complete.

2. There is no such thing as faith. That is to say we are not required to believe. We are what we believe we are and what we do only. While we have myths we are not required to believe them as religious fact.